As soon as the mega chain Ikea came forth with their UNG DRILL Ornate Black Plastic Frame, we all knew it would be insanely popular.

Rococo is the famously ornamental 18th century style which often features heavily ornate playful flourishes and whimsical sculptured designs. Popular in the 1730s, the design heavily influenced architecture, painting, sculpture and eventually furniture and decor.

Mirrors made after these styles became popular in the 50's by a company called Syracuse Ornamental Company who at the time produced ornamental carvings to embellish furniture. The company was founded in the late 1890's by Adolph Holstein who was a talented Austrian woodcarver.

The opportunity for his business to expand when Holstein developed a casting technique which produced a high quality product without the laborious intensity and time of wood carving. Holstein used Syroco to create perfect replicas of their original carvings.

Many of their molds featured a wood grain within the mold, giving their overall product a higher end feel for less money. As the modern movement hit in the 1940's their business turned from ornamental embellishments to novelty items which didn't profit as well, so the company returned to making the highly ornate wall mirrors, sconces, and decorations in the 1950's which became a huge sensation.
